

VEGGIE MEALS IN UNITED STATES NATIONAL PARKS (2016)

By Casey Brown and Heather Francis
Vegetarian Resource Group Interns

In conjunction with the 100th year anniversary of The National Park Service, over the past couple of months, we have been working on a project where we have been contacting the United States National Parks in hopes of finding out whether or not the parks offer vegetarian/vegan meals.

Over the course of the project we found most National Parks don't have any vegan options for their park services. What we discovered were convenience stores and snack shacks for many visitors to stop by as they are traveling through the parks. Most convenience stores contain trail mix, nuts, and various fruit selections for vegan and vegetarians alike. Since most don't have options, we have compiled a list of the National Parks with neighboring veg-friendly restaurants (if there are any). For the parks that do contain veg-friendly options, we added them to the list as well.

Although the list is on-going, and has taken two months to put together, it hasn't been super difficult to reach these parks. The park rangers and staff working for the National Park Service have been super receptive in answering our questions about whether or not their park has vegetarian and vegan options.

Overall, our best advice to those visiting a National Park is to bring your own food and beverages. There are many picnic areas available at each park alongside with stopping to when you're hungry. Also, it will be a stress-free way of traveling to the National Parks in conjunction with saving money on eating out. Of course, you can also dine at one of the nearby restaurants we mention below.
